

Strict enforcement important

YES, I truly agree with your recent article highlighting the speed limit in the SMART Tunnel ("Drivers who are not so SMART" – Sunday Star, Sept 25).

I had the fortunate experience of driving through the SMART Tunnel, and although I tried very hard to keep to the speed limit set, it made me look like a fool.

Other drivers were simply whizzing by, blind to the many reminders of the set speed limit.

One rather impatient driver behind me kept "flashing" his lights and this actually made me very nervous and intimidated.

I could not move to another lane because the other lane would lead me to another part of KL city, which was not my destination.

Overseas, I have been driven through a tunnel and the authorities there monitor motorists via auto-cameras and drivers who drive above the speed limit are mailed a fine with a snapshot of their car and licence plate.

But in Malaysia, those who obey the law are victimised and the ones who do not almost always get away with it.

When are we going to learn that strict enforcement is important, not just putting up a sign to remind motorists to obey the law?

Another question that comes to mind: is the speed limit in the SMART Tunnel suitable or should it be raised?

As it stands now, it's just a number.
